THe thing principally for which the memory of men is celebrated with prayse and Commendation is wisdom that (in whomsoever found, though meane of parentage and birth, or obscure by Countrey or Nation) deserves perpetuity of honour and reverence: for his wisdom that erects our minds to the contemplation and practise of divine things, it is wisdom that differences men from men, and makes man like to the Angels, 't is wisdom that rectifies all that's perverse and naught, either in the will or in the affections. Wisdom is that which steers all our actions to an happy conclusion.
